The Marriage Trifler HAZEL DEYO BATCHELOR

Barbara Knight before her marriage to Keith Grant looks upon marriage to Keith Grant looks upon marriage as just a necessary step to a woman's success in life. That it means adjusting oneself to another person's wishes, sacrifice of oneself occasionally, never occurs to Barbara at all. She is simply accepting life as her set accepts it, she is a marriage trifler. Keith is real, and wants real friends. The ceaseless round of trivical pleasures bores him, he wants a home and a wife, and he gets instead a beautiful woman whom he rarely, if ever, sees alone, and a showy apartment. In his office there is a girl of a different type, Katherine, Newbery, with whom he becomes friendly. Keith loves Barbara, but he likes Katherine's companionship. There is nothing wrong about his feeling for her, even when he takes her out to hunch one day, but Eleanor Knight, Barbara's sister, sees them and of course misinterprets the entire thing.

ELEANOR looked at her sister sitting in the low chair opposite her and hardened her young heart. There were many reasons why Barbara ought to be told, and not a single good reason why she. Eleanor, should keep still. With duick determination she said suddenly, "Barbara, there's something I think you ought to know."

With the words out of her mouth, words that she could not recall, she was suddenly frightened. Barbara had looked up quickly, a slight frown between her brows. Her first words were: Eleanor, darling, you're not in trouble of any kind?"

Eleanor shook her young head impa-
